Marjory's Atelier is a Kenyan fashion brand that creates beaded jewelry and wearables. When I began working with them, the founder's core problem was that customers routinely pushed back on their prices as "too steep," while they felt they were, if anything, underpriced for the labor and craftsmanship involved.

Insight.

Upon conducting an audit of The brand experience, we realised that the brand's visual and verbal language were misaligned with their value proposition. Their previous name of “Majorslay Closet” and a lack of a coherent brand voice or identity, were signaling "cute and cheap", while their value proposition, was "bold and sensual." The gap was between what she was making customers feel and what she actually wanted them to feel

Intervention

Brand mark & palette:

We picked a sensual, feminine silhouette to replace the generic butterfly logo they had before. We also settled on a minimalist black and pearl colour palette. These elements would carry the "bold and sensual feeling."

Brand voice and Social Presence:

Harmonized the brand's social channels around the new identity and voice-defined and applied as "the mischievous femme fatale". Confident, a little playful, unapologetically sensual.

Creative Direction and Content Strategy.

Designed two marketing campaigns behind product launches, including an editorial photoshoot and a content rollout strategy built to introduce the new positioning to existing and prospective customers.

Outcomes ↗

By aligning the brand's identity to match its ambition , we managed to reposition Marjory's Atelier, a Nairobi based, one person, handcrafted jewelry brand from "cute and affordable" to "bold and sensual"

- 4 additional new customer enquiries per month on average following the rebrand and campaign rollout.
- Two vending placements secured off the back of the new brand credibility.
- The founder went on to enroll in a business mentorship program for female entrepreneurs, applying the positioning and market thinking developed through this engagement to grow the business further
